Animal Care

Last Modified:

Animal Care works to ensure the humane treatment of more than 1 million vulnerable animals, nationwide. Through inspections and outreach, we oversee thousands of groups, from breeders to managers of horse shows, to make sure their animals receive care and treatment that meets Federal standards. We also provide national leadership on the safety and well-being of pets and other animals during disasters.

Priorities

Ensuring the Humane Treatment of Animals

Regulations established under the Animal Welfare Act (AWA) set standards for the humane care and treatment of certain animals exhibited to the public, sold for use

Protecting Animals in Emergencies

We work closely with other government organizations under the Federal Emergency Management Agency's (FEMA) National Response Framework to develop an integrated approach to disaster relief for pets and other animals.

[Ending the Practice of Soring Horses]

The Horse Protection Act and its associated regulations seek to put an end to soring–a cruel and inhumane practice in which chemical or mechanical irritants are applied to a horse's legs to enhance their gait. We monitor for sored horses which may lead to a disqualification from participating in exhibitions, shows, sales, or auctions.
